US subsidies have kept mobile phones expensive and the market for them small. Subsidies have pushed intelligent phone designs out of the market, so they are typically only available in affordable phones. So, finally, in the past couple years, we have started to see handsets with more than one or two processing cores. Before this, in the early 2000s, the smartest phones were single core CPUs with a GPRS modem or two. Google today offered two year terms for its Nexus One phone. This phone had a single core CPU with a Google Android operating system. Google's Nexus phone has since replaced that phone with a dual-core CPU, a far more capable phone. He said the future will bring more powerful low-cost phones. With fingerprint identification of the iPhone. We just showed, on the left, some of the smart application in two core ARM chips and more than one core phones. On the right here is what we think is going to be the smart phones of the future, two cost-optimized, low-cost, smart phones with fingerprint ID. Hardware wise, they are typical of a three-year touch phone, but they have multiple cores and we think these are going to be areas of high competition. In particular, we think we'll see dual core chips in smart phones in the United States in the next couple of years, but all over the world. We expect this is going to be a very large area of competition. If you want to learn more about high performance CPUs and the latest GPU hardware improvements, the instruction level is a very good place to start. I'll start in Silicon Valley for GPGPU. This is called GPU computing. It turns out that computers on GPUs use instructions designed for the CPU, but going directly to the GPU rather than going through a CPU. The reason is, well, computers are slow. The way CPUs are built, they execute instructions in serial order. When we go to the GPGPU, though, most instructions operate on multiple memory items at the same time. So, we can get a
